

In this week's article, guest author Marleen Mortin takes a closer look at unreached people groups, the big need they face and what this means for us as believers.

As a child, I grew up learning about missions from a young age. My parents often shared how people in other countries did not have a Bible or church or would be persecuted if they chose to follow Christ. It wasn't until I was in my thirties that I met someone who had never heard about Jesus. Sitting next to each other on a plane, we started talking about work and life. While I was talking with her, I realized that she had no idea who Jesus was. It was a surreal experience; I felt as if I was talking with someone from another world. This encounter opened my eyes and broke my heart for the unreached peoples of the world.
